Historical Note

The Basilica of Saint Louis, King of France is locally known as the Old Cathedral. It is located amidst the grounds of the Gateway Arch National Park, formerly called the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial. The church is not technically a part of the park. The Old Cathedral is currently the oldest-documented structure in St. Louis City.

The church building that stands today was built in 1834 by Bishop Joseph Rosati, but the Church was operating in St. Louis long before. The first baptismal entry from the Old Cathedral dates to 1766, when the priest Father Sebastian Meurin, SJ, noted the sacraments occurred in a tent as there was no church building yet. The church property has never changed hands from the Roman Catholic Church since it was designated as the church block in 1763 by Pierre Laclede. Three different church structures were built between 1770 and 1818.

In 1818, Bishop William Valentine DuBourg made St. Louis the see of the Diocese of the Louisiana and the Floridas, as opposed to operating the diocese from New Orleans. Thus, the Church of St. Louis became the Cathedral for the diocese. The official "cathedral" title was removed when the Cathedral Basilica of St. Louis, known locally as the "New Cathedral," was blessed by Archbishop John Glennon in 1914. However, local residents still refer to the Basilica of Saint Louis, King of France as the "Old Cathedral." Due to the Old Cathedral's historical importance, it was designated as a basilica by Pope John XXIII in 1961, and the official name of the parish became Basilica of Saint Louis, King of France.

The Basilica of Saint Louis, King of France has been the site of many historical events and visitors which are too many to note here. Of particular note is that the first U.S. chapter of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul was founded there in 1845, and the minutes from the society are included in this collection.
